Now is time for producers to select 2001 cotton varieties

Now is the time for cotton farmers to decide what variety they will plant next spring, and LSU AgCenter cotton specialist Dr. John Barnett has a little advice to offer.

A key part of the selection process is determining the varieties best suited for different fields and management plans, he said. “Note that I emphasize that you select varieties and not just one variety,” Barnett said. “You should always plant a mixture of varieties. Never put all of your faith or acreage in one variety. I observed some big problems when farmers used just one variety during the 2000 growing season.”

There are several factors farmers should consider when selecting varieties, Barnett said. The first of these is fiber properties and earliness. Relative earliness of varieties is estimated by harvesting plots on two dates about one to two weeks apart and calculating the percentage of the total crop harvested at the first harvest date, he said. The fiber properties include measurements for fiber strength, micronaire, length, uniformity and elongation, he said. Strength values between 23.5 through 25.4 will not receive a premium or discount. Values below 23.5 will be discounted and values above 25.4 will carry a premium on the loan chart, he said. The length, or UHM, represents the average length of the longest one-half of the fibers measured. The uniformity index is determined by dividing the average staple length of all the fibers by the UHM. Micronaire is a measurement of the lint surface area. Measurements above 4.9 or below 3.5 will result in a discount.

When choosing varieties for wilt soils, Barnett said it is important to test the soil for plant pathogenic nematodes and Fusarium, the fungus responsible for fusarium wilt. “While either pest alone can injure a crop, the combination of these pests can be devastating,” Barnett said. “Nematodes can injure cotton by wounding the roots and then feeding on the matter that oozes out. Fusarium gains entry into the plant through the wound made by the nematode. The fungus then develops inside the plant and may eventually stunt or kill the plant by secreting toxins and clogging the circulatory system.”

Cotton varieties are evaluated for tolerance or resistance to these pests, Barnett said. If the wilt-nematode complex is severe, rotating the field out of cotton may be the best move, he said. In fields with low to moderate populations of these pests, tolerant or resistant varieties and nematicides may provide acceptable control.

Genetically engineered, or transgenic, cotton is another variety Barnett said may be considered. These varieties are ones that have been genetically enhanced to resist certain herbicides and insects.

Transgenic cottons contain genes that confer resistance to Buctril herbicide applied overtop (BXN varieties), or Roundup Ultra (glyphosate) herbicide (Roundup Ready varieties), and/or to specific insects such as Bt varieties with Bollgard gene technology, he said. For specific uses, Barnett said to consult your local LSU AgCenter county agent.

As for seeding rate and stand, Barnett said two to three plants per row foot, or one plant every 4 to 6 inches, in rows spaced 30 to 40 inches apart is ideal. “Research has shown that higher plant populations reduce yield,” he said. “Lower plant populations tend to reduce harvesting efficiency of spindle pickers and may reduce yield.”

Seeding depth will vary with soil type and moisture; therefore, it is critical to consider soil type and available moisture when planting, Barnett said. “As a general, seed should be planted 0.75 to 2 inches deep,” he said. “In most cases, seed planted in heavy, or clay, soils should be planted shallower than seed planted in sandy soils.”

In addition to soil type, soil moisture also will affect the depth of planting, Barnett said. “Typically, seed is planted deeper in dry soils than in soils with adequate moisture for germination,” he said.

The number of acid delinted seed per pound varies from about 4,500 to 5,000 for cotton varieties planted in Louisiana, Barnett said. At the seeding rate mentioned, about 10 to 16 pounds of seed per acre will be needed.

One last bit of advice from Barnett is that producers should plant only recommended varieties that have yield and performance history in your area. “There is nothing wrong with planting a limited acreage in an unknown variety for your own information,” he said. “But when it comes to selecting varieties for the whole farm, go with proven, recommended varieties.”

New program to determine value of cow

The design of the U.S. cattle industry is headed for a complete makeover in the next decade and Louisiana researchers are trying to anticipate the new look and make changes to profit from it.

Currently Louisiana cattlemen raise their animals to the calf stage, sell them at local auction barns or ship them to Midwestern states to be fed out to full size and never hear about them or see them again. "The flaw in this historic way of treating our animals is that we don't know how large they grew over what period of time, the quality of the meat, or if they had diseases or other problems that caused them to be less than desirable for the buyer," said Commissioner of Agriculture and Forestry Bob Odom.

"This calf-to-carca ss program will determine a value for the cow as a meat product. Now we are getting a price based only on a weaned calf. In the future, producers will be able to tell buyers and other end users what they can expect when they invest in cattle produced by our Louisiana cattle industry," Odom said. "The program will take the animals from birth to the supermarket and track their growth and handling each step along the way."

Although the same methods are not used, the same end result already has been achieved with both hogs and poultry. "About 80 percent of the hogs sold at market now are priced as a lean product so that the hog farmer doesn't know what he is going to get for that hog, but he gets paid for how his hog produces in the carcass, that is, how lean the final meat product is," he said.

The cattle monitoring, inoculations, microchip implants and other logistical matters are being financed with a $65,300 grant through the U.S. Department of Agriculture's Federal-State Marketing Improvement Program. "What we are ultimately trying to do is add value to our cattlemen's end product," Odom said. With the results the producer gets from our tracking program as the animals progress through different stages, a series of performance characteristics will be established, permitting the cattle producer to make management decisions to get the highest quality animals possible."

"Some of the management decisions will be what type of bulls to use, the breed of cows to use to arrive at the type and quality of meat desired to reach the niche market he is trying to fill," said program director Dave Foster, head of the department's Market News division.

In the initial phase of the program, 32 cattle producers have each shipped a number of calves to three preconditioning sites at McNeese State University at Lake Charles, Louisiana Tech at Ruston and Idlewild Research Station near Clinton, where the animals are kept for 45 days. During the period they are measured and monitored and are given a series of inoculations against known diseases, Foster said.

"Most importantly each animal is given a microchip implant which gives them a individual tracking number which permits us to keep tabs on them throughout the entire feed out and slaughter process. This permits precise tracking to the ultimate end user," he said.
